BELOIT—The City of Beloit has hired a former business strategist as its next economic development director.

In a news release, the city announced the hiring of Jennifer Hall who will serve as economic development director and as president of the Greater Beloit Economic Development Corporation (GBEDC).

Hall previously worked as president of Business Solutions from 2004 to 2010, where she led the strategy for redevelopment of the “

as part of the State/Alpine tax increment financing district.

Hall most recently worked as vice president of government relations and community advocacy for Mercyhealth.

“Beloit has a reputation for quickly responding to developers and community leaders looking to grow in the region,” Hall said. “I look forward to expanding on the solid foundation already here in Beloit. Job creation and economic growth will be a significant priority as the City of Beloit and GBEDC collaborate together.”

Hall will be tasked with overseeing economic development efforts in the region, including in the Gateway Business Park and downtown Beloit as both areas have seen continued growth since 2009.

“Hall has experience with a wide breadth of economic development initiatives from small business start-up financial planning assistance to large corporation multi-faceted investments,” said Beloit City Manager Lori Curtis Luther.

GBEDC Board President Frank McKearn said Hall has a “demonstrated track record of getting people to the table.”

Outgoing economic development director Andrew Janke is retiring on Jan. 15 after over three decades of serving the Beloit area.
